KID Applauds CPSC, FDA warning on sleep positioners and urges caregivers to stop using this device

In January 2002, 8 week old Andy Sage died -- not from SIDS as the medical examiner thought at first, but from suffocating on a sleep positioner. Andy turned his head down toward the cushion of the positioning device and suffocated. Since that day his parents, Judy and Mark Sage, have worked tirelessly to alert others to this danger.

KID applauds the step the FDA and CPSC have taken today to reach parents with a safety warning about this deadly product. We are grateful to parents such as Judy or Mark Sage who are willing to put aside their own grief to work to protect other children.

"I'm confident that Andy would be with us today smiling if I did not use the sleep positioner," stated Judy Sage. "My son and daughter would have their brother. While I'm happy that my voice is being heard to save other babies—it is heartbreaking that it took multiple deaths to effect change. I hope today's action will keep another family from the grief our family has suffered."

"While the safety warning falls short of a ban of the product that KID would like to see," states Nancy Cowles, KID executive director. "We hope that it is enough to convince manufacturers to stop making this useless and dangerous product."

KID urges retailers to stop selling the product; parents currently using the product to stop using it; and expectant parents to cross it off their registry -- these products are unnecessary and dangerous.

Sleep positioners are sold to parents who are worried about SIDS -- believing this product will keep their baby safe. But the product is unnecessary and not supported by any SIDS organizations or medical professionals for the prevention of SIDS.

There are many recommendations to lower the chance of SIDS or suffocation. First and foremost place the baby to sleep on a firm mattress with a tightly fitted sheet in a safe (read not recalled, fully functioning, no missing parts) crib -- with nothing in the crib but a baby, placed on his or her back.
